The birth and history of the United States has been intimately connected to the design, development and use of more and more sophisticated weapons against enemies. For American soldiers, civilians, criminals and law enforcement officers, weapons have become a part of everyday life. Alongside the weapons have been the laws—and sometimes the dramatic absence of laws—governing their use. In this course, we will examine not only some of the fascinating technologies of weaponry, but also the ways in which American law and the American people regulate their possession and use.
