Michael Wines

is a New York-based national correspondent for The New York Times covering voting rights and related election issues. He has been a Times correspondent since 1988, first as a Washington reporter on justice and intelligence issues, then covering the White House, the 1992 election campaign and Congress. From 1998 to 2012 he was a foreign correspondent, first in Russia, then in South Africa and Beijing.

Before coming to The Times, he was a Washington-based reporter for the Los Angeles Times and for National Journal. He began reporting in his native Kentucky, where he covered a variety of beats for the now-defunct (and much missed) Louisville Times. He has done a lot of interesting things, but perhaps his most arresting experience involved falling down a deserted outhouse shaft at midnight while covering the Russian invasion of Chechnya.

He lives in New York with his wife Sharon LaFraniere, an investigative correspondent for the Times, and two Australian shepherds.
