Making the Transition from Individualistic to Cooperative Economy in Eliminating Anti-Black Oppression

Economic justice is often the missing piece in the struggle to eliminate anti-black oppression and institutional racism. How do we make the transition from an individualistic perspective and hierarchical and exploitative economic relationships to a more cooperative solidarity economy? Education is one of the keys. We need more opportunities in and out of formal education to learn about and practice cooperative economics, collective decision making, and social entrepreneurship. Prof. Jessica Gordon-Nembhard will use historic and current examples of community led co-op study circles, and solidarity and cooperative economics workshops (especially for youth and incarcerated students) to lead a discussion about how we can educate ourselves and start practicing cooperative economics in our every day lives.

Monday, October 26 / 1:40-2:55PM

Register here to get the Zoom information